Born in West Hartford, Noah Webster made America's first English dictionary. Webster was a teacher, and he didn't like the ① that were used in American schools. Most books came from England, and Webster thought that the students should learn from American books.

Webster graduated from Yale University in 1778. After that, he wanted to study law*, but his parents did not have enough money. He decided to get a job [あ] a teacher, and in 1783, he wrote a book to teach students how to read and write. It became very popular and was used [い] the next 100 years in schools all over America. More than 24 million [う] the books were sold.

Next, Webster decided to make a dictionary. ② At that time, dictionaries used in America came from England, too. Webster wanted to make an American dictionary for Americans. He finished his first dictionary in 1806 and it was the first truly American dictionary. Then he started working on an even bigger dictionary.

Webster worked on his second dictionary for more than 20 years. He visited libraries in the United States, England, and France, and he learned 26 languages, including Anglo-Saxon and Sanskrit, to find out more about the history of English words. When he finally finished the dictionary in 1828, he was 70 years old. He ③ it An American Dictionary of the English Language. It had ④ words in it. In 1841, he added* 5,000 words to it and made a dictionary with 75,000 words.

Webster's dictionaries were different [え] other dictionaries. He thought that the spelling* of some words was too ⑤ to read, so he changed them. For example, he changed "musick" to "music," "centre" to "center." Americans were also starting to use many new words such as skunk, hickory, and chowder that were not used in England. Webster put these new American words in his dictionaries. Webster's dictionaries are an important part of American culture and history.
